A: If you want to disable it, open chrome://settings/sync in your web browser and turn off the sync setting "Allow chrome to access your Google Account." and work capacity and the nature of the work. Depression Depression is a common side effect for some patients who have undergone a stoma. Patients who undergo ostomy surgery experience a significant drop in their quality of life. Although, it is found that quality of life is maintained well by most patients in the long-term. Depression is the number one concern for patients undergoing ostomy surgery as it is associated with the disability of performing everyday activities such as driving, work, or social interaction. Along with quality of life, the impact on body image can be another concern for the patient. Patients who undergo stoma formation experience a profound loss of body image and general self-concept. This may be because the person is not able to see their body clearly and has lost control of the functions of the body. This loss of body image is common in cancer patients who undergo ostomy surgery. As such, patients may be overly concerned with their ostomy and appearance. Patients who have undergone stoma formation are more prone to experiencing this due to the nature of their stoma and lack of any control over their ostomy output. People with ostomies that are dry or have no output of urine are more likely to experience depression. The cause of this is because they feel as though they are a burden to others. They are forced to carry around an ostomy bag, and have to worry about leakage. Dryness is common among patients with ileostomies. It is usually perceived as being a less positive experience than if the patients ostomy were to be filled with urine. Patients who experience depression after undergoing ostomy surgery can become isolated from family and friends. They are also likely to lack motivation to follow up with their diet as they struggle to feel good about themselves. Prevention The number of patients undergoing ostomy surgery is steadily rising as more people are choosing to undergo a stoma. The increase in the population who undergo stoma surgery is not only due 82157476af
